

This zine was created to challenge the way we treat and understand our origins (ancient, medieval and early modern). Despite millennia of oppression, women have made incredible and impressive contributions. They have inhabited roles that are jarring when placed alongside our postmodern assumptions that generally women did not play significant parts in history, because they could not. We want to demonstrate that they did, that many women did, and that history is subjective. Our zine is a platform for exploring that.

We want to deconstruct and reconstruct history. We have lots of questions. Why are school history textbooks brimming with images and narratives of white men? Why does history foreground war and royal history over daily life and domestic history? Why is so much of women's history only discussed by and accessible to academics? Why are there so many misconceptions about our past and our origins?
